

Long Viet Tran shows why OECD voters show decreasing support for personal income tax progressivity.

3pm

3:10

Scott Aronin proposes a theory for why ethnic demography has differential effects on different sectors of African economies.

Hahn Chang explores what political and societal factors affect IT project management for state governments in the United States.

3:20

3:30

David Silberthau shows how groups solidarity and activist organizations shaped Maori protest movements.

Sarah Libowsky explores the role of foreign markets and internal political conflict to explain Peru's failure to turn to the Left in the 2000s.

3:40

Brina Seidel argues that the decision to send aid as a loan or as a grant determines the fungibility of aid flows

3:50

Sejal Singh demonstrates how shifts in public opinion affect decision-making at the Supreme Court.

4pm

4:10

Jiawen Tang shows the consequences of economic geography for congressional voting on U.S. trade policy.

Rosa Taylor evaluates the language states used to discuss the 2011 intervention in Libya, and why it matters.

4:20

David Kang uses a field experiment to find out for whom and when email reminders boost student democratic participation.

4:30

4:40

Sam Dunkle examines whether the ways civil wars end affect the institutions that emerge and the economic growth that occurs in the post-conflict society.

4:50

Margaret Mattes considers the role of class identity in shaping policy opinions on redistributive taxation.